K k Roman K k Italick, both which are used in the English and several European languages; k black letter English and German, pronounced alone ká, but ought by analogy to be called ké, as bé, cé, dé, and the rest of the mute sisters; K κ Kappa Greek, from the Chaldee כפף קף Kaph, signifying the hollow of the hand, which כ in its figure resembles, the lower part whereof being elongated makes the final ך, and from this inverted is formed the Greek K, and by immutation, and bowing the right side, the small κ. The power of this letter is invaded by qu and c; as, κρηνίς, querquedula, dim. querquedula; κένον, cœnum: and in like manner the Latin C is expressed by the Greek K; as, Claudius Cæsar, Κλαύδιος Καίσαρ. And indeed the Latin C not only answers in sound to K, but also takes its figure from the same Hebrew letter: For as the figure of K is formed from the final ך, as before shown; so C is nothing but כ turned to the right, in compliance with the Western way of writing. Notwithstanding it appears that anciently K held its own place in many (especially Greek) words, and derivatives from thence, as κάλαιβρα, kalaibra, κωνισμός, kœnismus, καρχηδών, Karthago, καλάνδα, kalendæ; yet these also are equally written by c, vid. Quint. Instit. 1, 7. K has likewise been continued in some words of Hebrew extraction; as, in Karissimus, which occurs in ancient monuments, from קר; and in Kalumniā, from כלמה; K k. anciently a mark on the foreheads of those who were convicted of calumny. In our English tongue indeed, though disused in Latin, it is not only a frequent letter, but used even after c, to harden its sound; as in lick, and thick; but in words of Latin and Greek derivation may be spared; as in public, critic, hectic, &c. These words however coming to us in all probability through the medium of the French, it seemeth better to admitt K.

L 1 Roman, L 1 Italick, LI 1 old English and German, which when pronounced alone we call el, prefixing e, to it, in like manner as we also pronounce the other sister liquids el, em, en, er (corruptly ar) to distinguish them from the family of the mutes, whose sound we render articulate by postponing e, as bé, cé, dé, &c. In Hebrew this letter is called ל Lamedh, and among other significations denoteth a goad, or spit, which its figure resembles. In the Chaldean language it is styled ל Lamda, from whence comes the Greek Lambda, by inserting b; and by removing m from it, labda. The Latin L is formed from the Greek Λ, by straightening one of the acute legs, and turning the other into the basis. It possesses the first place in the order of liquids, and is, as Plato in his Cratyl. has observed, the sweetest of them all, being suited to soft and easy descriptions; as, Molle meum leuibus cor est violabile telis. It was usually sounded by the old Britons with a kind of aspiration, and was written in many words with ll, as it was afterwards with lh, as in llân, or lhân, a temple; llâu, or lhâu, a hand; which sound is made, by hissing l obliquely through the teeth, and aspirating it, though indeed it is best caught by the ear. Thus the most ancient Greeks sounded its sister P when initial, PH; as in PHOME, Roma; which in later times, after H was exterminated, being supplied by a note of aspiration prefixed, though pronounced after it, was written as it is now, Ρώμη; and this aspiration is still preserved in some Latin words of Greek extraction, as in Rhannus, Rhetor, &c. This liquid is subjoined to the mutes b, f, g, p, in the beginning of syllables in Latin words, as in blatta, eblandior; flo, confligo; gloria, conглоbo; plango, compleo; and also to t, and th, in deriveatives from the Greek, as in Atlas, athleta; but never before q and v. All the liquids by the grammarians are called the immutables; as in fact they are in respect to the mutes, but not in regard to themselves, which is evident from Νύμφη, lympa; αγέρ, agellus; λίερον, lilium, παῦρος, paulus. The change indeed of the final letter in the prepositions con, in, per, and inter, into the liquid, when compounding some simple word beginning therewith, seems arbitrary; and we may write either conligo, or colligo; inlido, or illido; perluo, or pelluo; interlego, or intellego, &c. the former way of writing having obtained by ancient use; and as in the other letters, so even in these particularly; the latter method having only been introduced to soften the sound: as we see also in prepositions ending with mutes, prefixed to words and beginning with mutes or liquids, which for the same reason suffer the same, or greater, variations; as, for instance, absfero, aufero; adnuo, annuo; adfero, affero; obfero, offero; transno, trano, &c. In some few words indeed the liquid l may seem substituted for d; as in lacryma for δάκρυμα, in alacris for ἀδάκρυς; but both these deriveations may justly be suspected, unless confirmed by more unexceptionable instances. In numeral notes, L is put for fifty, the half of C, or, as it was anciently written by the Saxons, ƿ, making the curve angular, and analogical to V, five, as being half an X, that is, ten. In the compendious notes of the ancients, L stands for Lælius, Lælia, Lucius, Luceius, Lex, Lector, Libertus, Libra; L. A. Lex alia; LA. C. Latini coloni; L. A. D. Locus alteri datus; L. AG. Lex Agraria; LAT. P. V. E. S. Latus pedes quinque & semissem; L. DD. D. Locum diis dedicavit; *L. M Latin, Μ Greek, called Μῶ, either from its sound, the Greek Μυῖα and the Latin ugio being formed from hence, or rather from μῶω, claudio, because it opens and shuts the lips; מ Hebrew in the beginning and middle of words; ׀, or, if the vacant space in the end of a line require it, ׀: it is perhaps called ׀ mem from its double form, open and shut, which is represented in writing its name; or it may be from ׀ a blot, which the Arabians use for its figure; M in English and German black letter. Its sound is inarticulate, being formed by the mouth through the lips. This letter, though a liquid, suffers no mute in Latin to stand before it in the same syllable, except g, and that only in one pure classical word, viz. agmen; although among the Greeks, who perhaps gave it a softer sound, it follows δ, σ, and τ, as in δμῶν, ἑσθμα, τμήσις; but in different syllables it doth not refuse to usher in its sister labials b and p, as in ambulo, and amplus; and also itself n, in mamma, and dammum, but in no other: For in order to avoid the company of the rest, it prevails with its neighbour n to be its substitute, as in anceps, anfractus, anbelo, anquiro, ansanctus (but this is likewise written amsanctus) which are all compounded of the inseparable preposition am: but the preposition circum for the most part keeps its m before all letters, though in some few words n is sometimes used indifferently for it, as in circundo, or circumdo; and sometimes loseth it, as in circueo, circuitio, which however it may equally retain. Before its sister semivowels l and r, its cognates, soften the sound. But m is not behindhand in office with its neighbour n, willingly taking its place before the labials b, p, and m, as in imbellis, impius, immodestus; combibo, compleo, commendo; and also in the Greek tongue, as in ἐμβάλλω, ἐμμένω, ἐμπνέω, and anciently likewise in divers words, as where we see in the Sigeian Psephism written in honour of Antiochus, τῇ βασιλείᾳ, τῶν πραγμάτων, τῇ μὲν ἱερείᾳ. Also before t, d, and g, as in tantum for tam tum, quendam for quemdam, quenquam for quemquam. M too in Latin words is put for the Greek ν, as in musam for μῶσαν, organum for ὄργανον, &c. But in Latin accusatives of the third declension, which answers to the fifth of the Greek, m is often a formative only, as in patrem, and matrem, from πατήρ, μητέρα. It is likewise servile in forming tenses of Latin verbs, as in notabam, notarem, from notare: Though this servility perhaps might be the reason why the ancients pronounced this letter very obscurely, especially before a vowel, as in optimus, and factus. Cato writ die hanc for diem hanc; and probably when not cut off by the poets, who then used it short, as for example in Cujus non hederæ circumiēre caput, Propert. this letter was not fully pronounced. M in numerals denotes one thousand, from the first letter of mille according to Priscian, but with more probability from its ancient Mark CIO, which by the negligence or ignorance of transcribers being drawn together and made M, the half of which, D, from hence stands for five hundred. In the compendious notes of the ancients, M. is used for Manlius, Marcus, Martius, or Mucius; M' Manius; M. B. Mulier bona; MAG. EQ. Magister equitum; MAG. MIL. Magister militum; MAT. P. FEC. & S. P. Q. Mater pia fecit & suis posterisque; M. M. P. Manu, mancipio, potestate.

Mòdium, ii. n. A bushel, Plin. 18, 6. & ante cum Plaut. sed frequentius

Mòdius, ii. m. [à מדר mensuravit] Modius continet libras 26, uncias 8, semimodius libras 13, uncias 4; sextarius uncias 20; bema 16; acetabulum, duas & dimidium; cyathus, fescunciam, drachmam & scrupulum; lingula, drachmas tres & scrupulum unum. (1) A measure, that which we call a bushel, but was indeed, as some reckon, but our peck and half, holding 16 sextiers; not only of dry things, as salt, Cic. beans, Hor. wheat, Cæs. peas, acorns, &c. Col. but of liquids also. (2) Abso. A bushel of wheat. (1) Assè modium populo dedit, Cic. Offic. 2, 17. Modius vini Parisinus tricenos senos sextarios nostros capit, sextarius autem octonas eas quas pintas dicimus, Bud. i. e. eight quarts English, Coop. If so, it was 256 of our quarts, which differeth much from the account given by him before of dry things, viz. that the modius contained 16 sextiers, and every sextier according to Bud. 24 cuncres, i. e. one pint and a half; so that the modius, says he, is just three gallons, i. e. our peck and half. But in wine being 256 quarts it maketh 64 gallons, i. e. 32 pecks, or eight bushels. However, the modius in liquids being the third part of an amphora, it may well be rendered a tierce. ¶ Pleno modio verborum honorem, they give me honourable words by the bushel, Cic. N n Roman, N n Italick; both which, as all the other letters, are frequently used in most of the modern languages of Europe; especially in such as descend from the Latin. The English indeed, besides these, have a black character somewhat like the German, in which this letter is thus expressed, nn; but of no great antiquity, and seldom used but in printing statutes and proclamations; for our Saxon ancestors used a letter very little differing from the Roman. The Hebrew tongue hath a double form of this letter; the one initial and medial נ, the other final ן, which might be the cause of calling it nn, which is expressive of both forms; in analogy to דד, which probably was so called from the same cause. Indeed there is a great show of reason why it should be called nn from the signification of the word,

N n Roman, N n Italick; both which, as all the other letters, are frequently used in most of the modern languages of Europe; especially in such as descend from the Latin. The English indeed, besides these, have a black character somewhat like the German, in which this letter is thus expressed, ŋ n; but of no great antiquity, and seldom used but in printing statutes and proclamations; for our Saxon ancestors used a letter very little differing from the Roman. The Hebrew tongue hath a double form of this letter; the one initial and medial ך, the other final ך, which might be the cause of calling it ךך, which is expressive of both forms; in analogy to םם, which probably was so called from the same cause. Indeed there is a great show of reason why it should be called ךך from the signification of the word, word, which is a child, as being the undoubted daughter of the mother N. The Greeks, in taking these two letters from them, seem to have had regard to both these reasons, discarding the finals in both, as having no occasion for them in their tongue; and yet, to show their near relation, gave them an articulation, calling the latter Nū, as they did the former Mū. Nor are these two liquids nearer in name, than they are in their figure, sound, and mutual offices in Greek and Latin. With respect to their figure, they differ just so much and no more, both in the capital and small form, as they do in their sound; M in being a fuller sound, and having one line more than N in the smaller sound, without any other difference. Their nearness in sound is more remarkable because made by distinct organs, the former being a labial, the latter a dental; which is caused by their equally touching the palate. Nor is their reciprocal use in languages less obvious: the plural termination ων in Hebrew, in the Chaldee dialect is ן; as on the contrary, the terminations ον and ων in Greek, are um in Latin; as ὠν οσούν; κεινὸν καένον; βραχίον brachium: ων and ην, the terminations of the accus. sing. of the second declension of the Greeks, am in the first declension of the Latins; as μῦσαν, Χολήν, μισάν, σχολάν. In Latin derivatives from the Greek, as v is sometimes changed into m, as in νέω, meco; so on the contrary μ into n, as in μειδέω, nideo: and as before the first rank of the mutes, and their sister labial m, n is changed into m for the better sound, as in imbellis, impius, immodicus; so on the contrary, in the second and third order, m is converted into n before c, q, d, t; as in anceps, nunquid, quendam, tantum: which also is done before f and b, as in anfractus, ambelus. The change of this letter into her other sister liquids l and r, before another l and r, as in illudo, irrideo, is common, as being only made for the better sound in pure Latin words; but the same is also done in Latin derivatives from the Greek tongue, as in ne from νή, lympba from λύμψη (whence our Master Priscian accounts for the use of the Latin numeral L, instead of N the Greek numeral for 50. The most antient Greeks, saith he, used L for N, which we still herein retain) in mora, from μονή, in crisso, from κρίσω. As γ, before κ, γ, χ, is in Greek sounded like n, so in Latin words derived from such, n is substituted for γ; as ancora, angelus, Anchises, for ἀγκυρα, ἄγγελος, Ἀχίλλης, though the more ancient Latins, in particular Accius, as Varro acquaints us, retained g, writing aggulus, aggens, agguilla, iggerunt; and this not only in derivatives from Greek, but perhaps in some of their own words. In many Latin words from Greek families, n is inserted, especially before mutes of the second and third order, as in mingo, lingo, jungo, scando, frango, from μυγῶ, λιγῶ, ζυγῶ, κινῶ, ἐρωγῶ, the second future tense of μυγέω, λιγέω, ζεύω, κινάω, ἐρῶω, which epenthetical custom is worthy to be noted, as by means thereof from verbs barytones the Latins naturalized many Greek words. But this inserted n disappears often in their derivatives, as in mielurio, ligurio, jugum, conjux, fragor, fragilis; as also before gn, as ignarus, ignavus, cognosco, and others. Besides the letters already mentioned, n admits after itself, s and x (a compound of s, and the second order of the mutes) as annus, ansa, anxius; and in composition j and v, as conjicio, convoco. In writing some Latin proper names, where ns concur either in the middle or end of words, the Greeks, to soften the sound, leave out n, as Ὁρτήσιος, Κλήμης, Πύδης, for Hortensius, Clemens, Pudens. This letter is often omitted by the Latins, when they enfranchise Greek words ending in ων; as Leo, Draco, for Λέων, Δράκων: but contrarywise, to Latin words ending in o, the Greeks add n, writing Κάτων, Νέρων, for Cato, Nero. In some inscriptions of the middle age, and transcripts of that time from elder originals, we find this letter inserted in the long syllables of many words; as Atlans, gigans, elephans: which perhaps may have happened through the ignorance of the transcribers, mistakeing a mark set over such syllables by some of the ancient writers only to show their quantity, for the letter n. I should have thought they might have affected to put this letter in the direct case of such words, because they found it in the oblique cases, had not such words as formosus and thensaurus checked that opinion. In the notes of the ancients, N is read Nec, nepos, non, num, Nonius, noster, nomisma, nisi, nummorum, numerator; NAV. Naves, navibus, navicula; NC. Nunc; N.C. Non certè, vel Nero Cæsar, vel Nero Claudius; NC. SN. CO. S.D.E. Notis civibus senatus consulti suffragium datum est; N. C. N. P. Non clam, nec precariò; N.C.C. Non calumniæ causâ; NBL. Nobilis; N.L. Non liquet; NO. Nobis; N.P. Netarius publicus.

O, immediately derived from the original Greek of the same form, in which form it continues in most of the languages of Europe, at least in all which confess a Greek; or Latin, descent, is the fourth vowel, and fourteenth letter in the Latin and English alphabets, and had a double sound, both short and long, which, if we had not been told so by Quint. Inst. I, 13, is evident in itself. For it could not be otherwise before the invention of ω, several ages after the days of Cadmus; which indeed is not a different letter from ο, but the same, with the connotation of a different quantity, or double time, and that also often not observed by the Greek poets; or perhaps doubled, as its small figure ω seems to evince; and its sound, which differs very little from that of ου, which most anciently was sometimes expressed by a simple ο, as Fabius tells us, and we are further assured from the Βερεφνηδον and Delian inscriptions: in the former whereof we meet ΦΑΝΟΔΙΚΟ ΕΙΜΙ ΤΟ ΗΕΡΜΟΚΡΑΤΟΣ, &c. for Φανοδοίκου εἰμι τοῦ Ἑρμοκράτους, and in the latter, ΤΟ ΑΥΤΟ ΔΙΘΟ ΑΝΑΡΙΑΣ, for Τῷ αὐτῷ λίθου. And the name of ο itself was originally ου, as Quintilian intimates. What I have said of this fourth vowel may be likewise affirmed of the second ε, which had also two sounds before the invention of η; at which time, as ο had both the sound and name of ου, ε seems to have had the sound, and sometimes the name of ει, for anciently they writ and read ΤΕΙ ΑΓΑΘΕΙ ΤΥΧΕΙ for τῇ ἀγαθῇ τυχῇ, as the more modern Greeks writ: wherein, and in the like words, they however subscribed the exterminated ι. Indeed this increase of the number of vowels seems rather introduced from an affectation of novelty, than any real necessity; seeing the Latins, who took a great part of their language from them, never imitated, and indeed never found any occasion for such an innovation. But the Greeks rested not here, for they invented also six supernumerary consonants ζ, ξ, ψ, and φ, χ, θ, all which are rather nexus literarum than real letters; the three former being only a connecting of the three orders of the mutes and the letter σ; the three latter a connecting the same orders and the letter Η. Thus ζ connects the third order with σ, ξ the second order; and ψ the first. In like manner, θ includes Η in the sister mutes of the third order; χ includes the same in the mutes of the second; and φ doth the same in the first order: and all these were writ in the first Greek alphabet with two distinct letters. For the letter β held the same place in the Greek alphabet as it doth now in the Latin and ours, at the time when these letters, or, more properly, compendious ways of writing, were invented. And here we may observe, that of all these eight new letters, as the Greeks pleased to call them, the Latins only espoused two κ and χ, the former whereof they seldom used, as indeed having no occasion for it, the latter chiefly in Greek words, and servile uses; so unnecessary they accounted these innovations. This I judged proper in this place to observe once for all, to show the perfection of the Cadmean alphabet; and now proceed to a further dissertation on the letter O. The Greeks, as they framed theirs wholly from the Hebrew alphabet, so undoubtedly had this letter from the Hebrew ו, to which it answers both in the order of the letters and numerals, which in both is seventy. How ο by the Greeks came to be adopted for this Hebrew guttural, was sagaciously found out, and judiciously accounted for, by the learned Dr. Littleton; who observes, that the Greeks took their three doubtful vowels α, ι, υ, from the Hebrew א, י, ו, to which three consonants they assigned the parts of vowels, by the help whereof they read before the invention of points; for א reading a; for י, e and i; for ו, o and u. Now the Greeks observing that the Hebrews had given their first guttural א a vocal power, not knowing how better to transplant them, gave the same power to the three remaining gutturals, making ε from א he; η from א heth, Chald. hetha; and ο from ו, which, as we said above, was first sounded ου, but afterwards, that ο might be upon a level with ε, to which as having a double sound they had given a double character, to the long sound of ο they assigned likewise a double figure Ω, which from its largeness in respect to the ο they called Ω μέγας, or the great ο, and consequently the primitive ο began to be called ο μικρόν, or the little ο. As to the form of ο, this account may be given: its mother ו signifies either an eye or a fountain, which this figure in some sort represents; the former with its corner, the latter with its stream. The Greeks neglecting the adjuncts, drew the eye or fountain orbicular, to express the round form of the mouth in making the sound. This vowel is changed into every other vowel, and every vowel into it; as from ἀράχων aratum, so from spartum sporta: as from γόνυ genu, so from pando pondus; as from κίς cinis, so from πύθος post; as from ἀλὸς alumnus, so from νύξ nox. This vowel was not in use among some nations of Italy, as Pliny informs us, namely the Tuscans, and more ancient Umbrians, and therefore u was substituted for it. And indeed the ancient Roman writers sometimes do the same, as Acherunte, bubus, frundescere, &c. Lucr. On the contrary, others used ο more frequently for u, writing advorsus, quom, servom, voltis, volutus, &c. for adversus, quum, &c. O is also used by the ancients for au, as codex, colix, plodo, plastrum, for caudex, caulis, &c. In the notes of the ancients, O. CON. is read Opus conductum; O.C.Q. Opera, consilioque; O.D.M. Operæ donum, munus; O.L.O. Opus locatum.
